Customer Development Definition

Customer development is a framework that is used to determine whether or not a product fulfills a need or needs of the customer. It is part of the lean startup concept which is composed of business model design, customer development, and agile engineering. Customer development succeeds in the business model design stage and assumes that the model has untested inferences contained within it. The process of customer development then validates the inferences, voids them, or identifies a need to modify them. The framework, if used correctly, should result in a final product that solves a real-world problem for the consumer, is viable to produce and scale, and strikes the right price point for all stakeholders.
